About

Tizeti is a Nigerian internet service provider founded in 2013 that focuses on delivering affordable broadband to cities and communities outside the main fibre-heavy corridors. It has built a reputation around serving households and small businesses in places that are often overlooked by premium connectivity providers.

Its model is based on wireless broadband supported by solar-powered infrastructure, which helps address one of the biggest practical problems in Nigerian telecoms: unreliable power supply. By reducing dependence on diesel-heavy base stations and grid electricity, Tizeti has been able to improve service continuity while keeping operating costs lower than many traditional providers. That matters in markets where affordability is just as important as raw speed.

Tizeti’s strategic focus on tier-two and tier-three cities such as Ibadan, Ogun, and Abeokuta reflects a wider gap in Nigeria’s broadband market. While many operators prioritize Lagos and other major commercial hubs, Tizeti has targeted users who still need reliable internet for work, study, and business but cannot justify expensive enterprise-grade connectivity. Its unlimited broadband packages have made it especially attractive to residential customers and SMEs looking for predictable monthly costs.

The company’s expansion also speaks to a larger structural opportunity in Nigeria’s digital economy. As more businesses move online and more households depend on internet access for education and commerce, the demand for affordable last-mile broadband continues to grow.

Tizeti’s positioning gives it relevance not only as an ISP but as part of the country’s broader connectivity infrastructure.
